November 17, 2010 10:33 PM

The Hay-Adams, in Washington, D.C., announced its reopening to the public after a renovation to modernize and update guest accommodations while remaining true to its historic roots. This is the hotel's second-largest enhancement, after a $20 million renovation in March 2002. Guests of the Hay-Adams will enjoy elevator improvements, a modernized Business Center and a new fitness center. The roof terrace event space, the "Top of the Hay," is scheduled for completion in January 2011.

Interconnecting function rooms will be available individually or in combination, allowing guests to customize the space for events with appropriate room sizing. Depending on the guest list, this area can host 15 to 300 people. With the vision of interior designer Tom Pheasant and architectural design firm, Hartman-Cox Architects, the Hay-Adams updated its aesthetics and décor with new color palettes, mosaic tiles, marble floors, custom-designed carpets and Scalamandre fabrics. The Hay-Adams revamped amenities to include 300 Count Frette linens, European Etro toiletries, goose-down duvet covers, plush robes and slippers. Recognizing the needs of the Hay-Adams business traveler, the hotel technologically enhanced guestrooms and meeting spaces, adding new widescreen 37-inch HD flat-screen televisions with more than 75 digital channels in every room and complimentary access to Wi-Fi and high-speed Internet connectivity in all public areas, meeting rooms and guest rooms. The hotel also installed a Bose Wave Music CD System with iPod capability in every room along with three two-line telephones and an in-room safe that can accommodate a laptop computer.
